

Tips for managing nutritional needs when tired

- Try eating small, frequent meals throughout the day.
- Prepare extra food on days when you feel well; freeze in individual-sized packages for days when you don't feel as well.
- Keep your pantry and refrigerator well-stocked with convenient and favorite foods.
- Eat easy-to-prepare foods, such as sandwiches, frozen entrees, nutrition/energy bars and shakes.
- Choose foods that require less chewing and are easy to eat (soups, stews, casseroles, etc.).
- Accept gifts of food and offers of help from friends and family.
- Use foil containers, paper napkins, and disposable dishes and utensils for easy cleanup.
- Drink an oral nutritional supplement such as Ensure Complete™ twice a day to provide a convenient source of extra nutrition.

Proper nutrition is a vital part of your cancer treatment—especially when you're feeling too drained to eat

When you're being treated for cancer, fatigue can derail your drive to eat—let alone eat well. Not getting the nutrients and calories needed to build and maintain strength makes it harder to withstand the effects of cancer and its treatment. Good nutrition can help minimize the side effects associated with your treatment.

Abbott Nutrition provides trusted solutions for fueling your body with what it needs to help battle fatigue, regain strength, and keep pace with your treatment plan.
